This chapter analyses the various tests adopted by the courts and tribunals to distinguish between the contract of employment and the contract for services. It considers the history of employment, moving from a master and servant arrangement to the emergence of the 'mutual' or 'reciprocal' contract of employment. It considers the statutory concept of continuous employment, whereby an ...

Part II The constitution of employment and personal work ...

This chapter argues that the expansion and restatement of the law of the contract of employment is a feasible and useful project. However, the complete execution of it would consist of an authoritative codification of the law of personal work or employment contracts. If that larger project would be undertaken in the future, this would involve a heavy investment of creative energy on the part ...
